Generic packages have to hold together the packages for the containers and the container contents. In the case of stacks of bottles for example, the packaging material on the edges of the several neighboring stacks has to be held together firmly enough that the user and/or the carrier can move the stack of containers without making the stacks budge. In addition, in many cases, the stacks of bottles have to be capable of being gripped by hand without the stack being crushed and without the stack of bottles or the items held in the packages being damaged. The stack of bottles is usually surrounded by a support structure or base on which the stack of bottles rests. The base is usually provided with a guide profile for the edges of the neighboring stack to rest on, either in the region of the guide profile or, if the base has no guide profile, the stack is to be supported by a pot-shaped support instead of the base. This type of packaging is thus distinguished by the fact that it has a base that is either provided with a guide profile or a pot-shaped support. In order to be able to increase the volume of the container package, it is known to cover the container contents with a foil. The known containers have the disadvantage that a package is not formed until the packaging material has been unfolded, whereby the cost of making the package is relatively high. In addition, in the case of stacks of identical containers, the foil packages have to be individually wrapped in an undivided process./* * Copyright (C) 2011-2020 Intel Corporation.
